Places Visited

Clifton Suspension Bridge

The Clifton Suspension Bridge is the symbol of the city of Bristol and spans across the picturesque Avon Gorge. It is a Grade I listed structure and has attracted visitors for the past 150 years. Isambard Kingdom Brunel was appointed the project engineer at the age of 24 and it was his first major commission. Work began on the bridge in 1831 but the project was troubled with political and financial difficulties and by 1843 the project was abandoned with only the towers being completed. After the death of Brunel in 1859 (aged 53) the bridge was completed as a memorial and was finally opened in 1864.

SS Great Britain

The SS Great Britain was a world first when she was launched in Bristol in 1843, and at the time of her launch was by far the largest ship in the world, over 100 feet longer than her rivals and the first screw propelled, ocean-going, wrought iron ship. Designed initially for the transatlantic luxury passenger trade, she could carry 252 first and second class passengers and 130 crew. While her first few voyages successfully demonstrated her potential there were far fewer passengers than anticipated and her career as a passenger liner was cut short when she ran aground on the sands of Dundrum Bay in Northern Ireland in 1846. After this she went under the control of new owners Gibbs Bright & Co. from the years 1852 - 1876 where she went under a lot of renovation and became a fast and luxurious emigrant carrier where she frequented Australia and even carried the first ever English cricket team to tour there. Through the years she has been chartered by the British Government to carry troops to and from the Crimean War and further trooping voyages carrying the 17th Lancers and 8th Hussars to the Indian Mutiny. By the 1870's the SS Great Britain was barely recognisable as the same vessel that was launched in 1843, she transported Welsh coal to San Francisco around Cape Horn until she ran into trouble around the Cape and was forced to run for shelter in Port Stanley, in the Falkland Islands. She remained here through the First World War with coal from her hold helping to replenish the battle cruisers HMS Inflexible and HMS Invincible. By 1937 the SS Great Britain's hull was no longer watertight, and after being towed a short distance from Port Stanley she was beached. Holes were driven in her sides and she was abandoned to the elements. Finally, in 1970, an epic salvage effort re-floated the ship and she was towed back home across the Atlantic to Bristol where she still stands today.
